Bio

Nicholas Sandercock serves the firm's medical malpractice defense, commercial litigation, and wedding and entertainment industry clients. He is known for his ability to find the needle in the haystack and is able to develop defense strategies based on facts that others may miss. His knowledge and perseverance make him a valuable asset to Gross McGinley's litigation team.

Growing up with parents in the medical field exposed Nick to the realities of medical malpractice at an early age. He realized the need for good lawyers to defend doctors doing good work, so they can continue to help people. Nick conveys this passion when representing the firm's hospital, physician practice, and nursing home clients.

As a contract law and wedding attorney, Nick helps individuals and wedding industry professionals understand the contracts they are signing and any obligations and risks they may be assuming. He counsels couples who feel a vendor or venue may not have fulfilled their obligations, and litigates on their behalf when necessary.

Prior to joining Gross McGinley, Nick worked for a large Philadelphia law firm, assisting in premises liability, products liability, professional liability, general liability matters. He also previously worked in the restaurant business as both an operator and high-level manager of training, giving him a unique perspective when representing business clients in commercial litigation matters.
